The truth of in Manipur's politics

"LIES" no matter how big or small always crack the foundation of "TRUST". There were times when the candidates made false promises during election time and fooled the people to woe the voter. The moment they were elected they often forgot what they had promised to the people often led a live thinking that the general public who elected them are bunch of ignorant fools who can be driven at any direction. The sinister concept become phenomenon and now people (almost all) now started thinking that there is no true leader who deserve victory in any of the election. But as the hangover system still has to be followed and continue there cannot be a full stop to the ongoing process. Election is mandatory for a democratic country. And for that candidates are required. In order to form government there again need political party and those candidates need to be attached to any of the political party to render their service with effective power. We are not sure if God frequently surfaces in the form of man, as is commonly believed. But what we can be dead certain is the fact that his arch enemy Satan often manifests himself, especially in Manipur, in the form of politicians. These incarnations of Satan, who are now running amok with the people's sensibilities, have cast such a nasty spell on the state that it is well nigh impossible for the people who elected them in the first place, to retain even a semblance of sanity. There could be no other logical explanation to the goings on in the political arena than taking refuge in the unnatural and the irrational. And for the teeming millions who had inflicted this handful of pests on themselves, there could be no other option but to bemoan their fate. The curse, call it the millenium curse, is well and truly upon us. It would be an understatement to say that there is something very basically wrong with our polity. Things have now come to such a pass that our state of Manipur can neither move forward nor backward but remain painfully suspended in a maze of anarchy and disorder. The scourge of politicians have indeed taken a heavy toll, not only of the rich but also of its psyche. The epidemic is now all pervading and has invaded the very roots of the country's integrity and well being thereby impeding its prosperity and peace. Whatever the party, whatever their ideology and hue, when it comes to pursuit of power and pelf, our politicians are at their wily best and very united too in their mission. If only these characters demonstrate the same solidarity and zeal in nation building, things would have been much different. But alas, their penchant for self-preservation has always won over patriotism, their quest for wealth has always been at the nation's expense and above all their instinct for survival has always prevailed over the nation's. They have always prospered even as the state disintegrated, and they are always in a position of strength, be it 'secularism or communalism' that is at play. But what about the 25 lakhs people who elected them? They are never in the reckoning.

Contd. from yesterday issue

Human Rights and Self-Determination as Prerequisites for Real Development

In Chhattisgarh, Jharkhand, Andhra Pradesh, MP and West Bengal – many similar stories of extreme levels of repression against villagers trying to prevent takeovers of their lands for industry; and similar mass police action against protestors against the Kudankulam and Jaipur nuclear power stations, in Tamil Nadu and Maharashtra. What this has in common with the Northeast dams issue is this fact of investment for electricity-production being protected by use of security forces. The term 'security forces' implies a duty to uphold the security of citizens. What is even more worrying is that we witness a militarization of the very areas being 'developed'. In fact, one area of undoubted growth in Central India, as in the Northeast, is in recruitment to security forces, and the militarization of these areas by more and more camps and population of security personnel. In a longer view, one can trace the history of western and modern 'civilisation' as a history of arms technology, from stone to bronze to iron ages to the steel and aluminum age, dependent on fossil fuels and nano-technology that we live in now. In a sense, war is the biggest business, and an arms industry exporting weapons is the symbol of a 'developed country', including Sweden and its Bofors, which was converted from a steel to an arms company by one of the archetypal 'merchants of death' who made his fortune as an arms salesman, and instituted a peace prize to hide his shame – Alfred Nobel. The arms industry not only makes a business out of war, it is a centre of corruption worldwide – emanating from the 'developed countries' – and is using up the earth's last, precious minerals and fossil fuels at an ever-accelerating rate to fuel the escalating wars of the present time. In other words, from dams to steel, aluminum and nuclear energy, the mainstream development scheme promoted by the World Bank and other financial institutions is oriented to making money from war and conflict. US security forces have committed appalling human rights abuses in Afghanistan, Iraq and other countries, for which very few have been held accountable. Especially after the attack using aircraft on 11th September 2001, the wars have escalated in the name of fighting terror – but fighting terror with an even greater terror, of hi-tech weaponry, and security forces that commit human rights abuses with impunity. When the world's superpower behaves like this, it sets the model that security forces in other countries copy. In Chhattisgarh, as in Manipur, a large proportion of rapes are committed by men in uniform, and when justice cannot be had through the courts, state terror inevitably fuels insurgency. Sanjaiboba frequently drew attention to what is happening in other countries, to shed light on events in Northeast India. The list includes Afghanistan when the Americans started bombing it in October 2001, Kosovo, Puerto Rico, Burma and East Timor. Among the countries where indigenous people are facing the worst oppression right now are West Papua (Irian Jaya) in Indonesia.

It is becoming increasingly urgent to discover alternative paradigms of development. Scotland's bid for Independence is watched with interest from Northeast India, and the rising strength of the Scottish National Party. A key issue here is control of oil, as also expressed in the Dimapur and Agartala Declarations (2013).

Right now we witness the forging of a new model of multi-ethnic, 'democratic federalism' by Kurds in North Syria. Kurds have been resisting assimilation by hierarchical mainstream societies for about 5,000 years. Jaipal Singh asserted that India's tribal peoples are some of the most democratic people on earth; and that others should learn democratic ways from them. Indigenous societies and their grounded, slow-paced economies show the way ahead, not just the way of the past. Real development depends on improvements in people's well-being, which has to be based on food, water and livelihood security, and security of life. Shouldn't respect for human rights be taken as the starting point for real development? (Concluded)
