When Imphal becomes a nucleus of trade and commerce in South East Asian economy

By: Ningombam Bupenda Meitei
Since the beginning of an exchange of trade and ideas of humans in ancient China, ancient Manipur and South East Asian region, Imphal has been the centre of meeting of people, ideas, cultures, religions and philosophies. The ancient Chinese silk route also passed through Imphal, and Manipur till today has the imprint of Greek route going towards Greek civilization. Ptolemy, the famous Greek astronomer, mathematician and geographer knew about Manipur and recorded it as "Mareura" in the 2nd century A.D. Manipur, with its first evidence of Pleistocene man in 30,000 B.C, a period of Old Stonge Age, was known in different names – such as, "Cassay" by the Shans or the Pongs who are spread in today's Burma, Northern Thailand, Yunnan province of China and Laos; "Kathe" by the Burmese, runnan province or China and Laos; Kathe by the Burmese, and "Mecklee" or "Meckley" by the Assamese - by the civilizations around it. In signing the first treaty of 1762 between the British East India Company and the then Maharaja of Manipur Maharaja Bhagyachandra, who developed Manipuri classical dance – Ras Lila of Radha and Krishna, the treaty recognized Manipur as "Meckley."

The concept of "Look East Policy" which later gets evolved into "Act East", by the present Prime Minister Narendra Modi, is a post – India's independence, New Delhi's effort of "re-engaging" - not necessarily a "new engagement", considering the historic trade exchange of ancient civilizations with Imphal or the ancient royal capital called Kangla - the potentials of trade and commerce of Imphal with the rest of South East Asian economy, but much before India became independent in 1947, already many Tamils from Tamil Nadu had started drifting to Moreh, the international border town of Manipur bordering with Myanmar, to proactively participate in trading activities with the Burmese, and today, in Moreh, Tamil Sangam, with a considerable population of Tamils, or rather Manipuri Tamils, exists with their Tamil culture being heavily influenced by Manipuri culture and foods. In fact, the legendary dancer of India's film industry, Helen, came to India from Burma by passing through Imphal. Thousands of years before the Europe's Renaissance and Industrial Revolution, the concept of trade already existed vibrantly in Imphal, but such deep and vast trading and commercial might of Imphal has been kept under the control of New Delhi's policies once Manipur was recorded as a part of India in 1949. Today, in the first week of this month, April, of 2016, Manipur initiated its first Industrial Expo, from 4th to 10th April, and North East—ASEAN Business Summit, from 7th to 9th April, in Imphal, thereby making a fresh and new attempt to re-ignite the hidden fires of ancient trade and commerce, which has been in place for thousands of years in the past including British Manipur period, of the people of Manipur along with its neighbouring countries of South East Asia.
